Afterimage

for Michael Snow

What happens in uninhabited spaces (New York loft: 1966) still exists in hippocampal-mind & still frame film: closer, closer. She walks across the floor, but brief – I thought I brushed her shadow, inch -by- inch. Empty wall travesty: tint my 16 mm polyester-emulsion: life. Flicker: filter orange & stop Strawberry Fields (a tractor-trailer cuts across clear windows, one -by- one).

Image burn-in: photo
receptor projects me: discomfort. Eyes-rapid in wake of rack-lux light.
Again. A shadow. A woman: clicking rotary-dials: *There's a man lying on the floor.
I think he's dead.* Close, close: fade-in, in sharp frequency:

ever-increasing beeping & jagged-hum
Wave (length)s

The Depot

I.

Scaffolds mark the cusp of a new city, I'm still burning downtown – train shuffle, rattle my slate-tile floors: there is no tunnel to my doors. I barricade us in.

II.

I am Corktown, blooming marble & bronze, a Corinthian-bone tower of commerce: manufactured grass littered mahogany: no sticks, no stones.

I can take you anywhere, but where would you want to go? Passengers can't take the wrong train. Come see my floors, wainscoting & terrazzo, say your goodbyes:

take your first step, frontier storefronts: take the boards off, open up shop inside: cracked door frames

& crown molding: a deep-throated whistle – call this place home.
