Weekends Spent Watching HGTV

I marvel at an open-air atrium, lined with potted greens and hanging plants and rosy-cheeked geraniums peering over their enclosures. They gleam at the high noon sun streaming down slightly askew upon teacups and saucers, and a perfect paired pot melds Earl Grey leaves and water. It brews as we sit at a wrought iron table except

I am just carving pictures in the blackest of nights, etching memories into the whitewashed flash before my nose. I smell canvas, not soil, and it seems that I plant only parasites.

Even now, I can see it: the way the sun lies on a garden reaching up to ever-ephemeral skies.
