“Good to see you.” the blurring lights of northern boulevard slinking in sleep paralysis; the hills the valleys of a fringe town whispering salt-mined promises meanwhile: across millennia of trees and interstate highway, the long island mansions & green park and clean street fill me clean empty-full like the nassau county eyewitness news 7 and the hum of the long island express-way the backnoise for ponzi schem-atic villages their vibrating anxiety and i love them, the way i love friends who were never friends in a three-story estate, should-have-gone there-should-have-tried-harder; please, prove: that i want the city because my friends say i want it, “Complacent,” i say about the upstate campus, sipping overpriced bubble tea, in 48 hours i’ll be in a yellow valley, still wondering what complacent means— (wherever i am i always want to go home)
